MARKET COMMENTS

The year 2024 presented both opportunities and challenges for the Marquest Mining Québec 2023-II Super Flow-Through Limited Partnership. While the broader Metals and Mining sector demonstrated significant strength, as reflected in the S&P/TSX Venture Composite Index's year-to-date gain of 12.4%, the junior mining exploration sub-sector faced persistent headwinds. Due to its higher risk profile, investor capital remained cautious, limiting growth in this area despite overall sector optimism.

Much of the optimism in the Metals and Mining sector was driven by signals from Federal Reserve officials indicating a willingness to further reduce interest rates as inflation pressures eased throughout the year. Additionally, strong performance in key commodities such as uranium, gold, and copper helped maintain a positive sentiment throughout 2024. Although the junior mining companies selected by the Marquest Mining Québec 2023-II SFT LP underperformed earlier in the year due to their early-stage development and lack of direct exposure to rising commodity prices, a notable rebound took place in October. Renewed interest in the junior mining sub-sector is now emerging as capital begins to flow back down the risk spectrum. This resurgence has been supported by higher commodity prices, lower interest rates, and overall economic resilience.

Despite the difficulties the junior mining sector faced in 2024, there are strong reasons for optimism as we look ahead to 2025. The risk of a recession in both Canada and the U.S. has significantly diminished, commodity prices remain elevated with upward momentum, and economic fundamentals continue to strengthen, bolstered by robust corporate earnings. This environment creates a positive outlook for Metals and Mining equities through the remainder of 2024 and into 2025. The Canadian junior mining sector is well-positioned to benefit from rising commodity prices, increased capital flows, and a resilient economic landscape.
